PEDAGOGY:

OUR VISION

Information technology is the science of tomorrow.

Technology is an integral part of every sector and is constantly evolving: transportation, energy, media, retail, healthcare, finance, and beyond.

As a result, IT professionals must be able to work across sectors and with multiple kinds of technologies. Epitech trains students in both high level technical and interpersonal skills to be able to collaborate across domains. Students at Epitech must work together, across backgrounds, visions, and experiences, to make their projects work on a practical level. And that is what Epitech is all about.

OUR MISSION

Project-based learning drives the Epitech experience. By the end of the program, students will have completed dozens of diverse projects using the latest technologies in the field of IT. They become innovative experts, all the while learning how to adapt and communicate with non-developers. Epitech does not teach technologies but creates a real-world learning environment that enables students to learn independently, understand business practices, work in teams and convince decision-makers. With its unique educational model, Epitech guides students not to learn a list of technologies, but to master the best qualities of an IT professional.

OUR METHOD

The Epitech project-based learning method is founded on active and inductive learning. Students must seek out knowledge actively, by trying different techniques to find the best solution. The classic “professor” as the intermediary between knowledge and the student is replaced by instructors who guide students in their learning.

In a reflection of a typical professional environment in the field, students are confronted with real-life situations for which they do not yet have the technical background allowing them to resolve the problem. They must then analyse the situation and research and acquire the knowledge and know-how necessary to resolve it on their own.

Through these real-life situations, students are led to exchange, discuss, and challenge their opinions. These exchanges reveal paths, questions, and even new problems. Each student must seek, verify and test different elements in order to come up with the best solution.
